Spain's Civil Guard searched for a black panther near a small village

Residents of Ventas de Huelma, in Andalusia, declared that they had seen a large feline and heard roars.

A Civil Guard helicopter and multiple volunteers from Spain's Civil Protection agency were searching for a black panther in Ventas de Huelma, a small village in the southern province of Granada. Local authorities warned about the animal's presence after several residents reported that they had seen it on Friday, 11th September 2020. A spokesperson from Spain's Civil Guard, however, said they couldn't confirm whether or not the panther really existed.

The first alert came at around 8pm on Friday. That day a married couple spotted a large black animal that they identified as a panther when they were walking just 300 metres from the village. The mayor was warned of the sighting on Saturday morning, and immediately informed the public.

On Sunday morning, the Civil Guard's Seprona organized a ground team and a helicopter search. But by Monday afternoon nobody had seen the creature. That evening Civil Guard officers were preparing to explore the area again using night vision equipment. The goal was to start the search at sunset, when black panthers are most active. Finally, a member of the Civil Protection group also saw the animal. "Little by little we're corroborating that what the couple saw was true," said the mayor. Some residents claimed they had heard panther-like sounds too.

The following days villagers were advised to stay away from the fields outside town, and call the emergency services if they recognized the panther.
